Empires can be administered only by those who have convinced themselves that they are indeed a superior people, which means all empires are racist. They can be run only on the basis of military superiority and elitism, and with a professional benevolence which is only another form of violence.

-Felix Greene

America’s fatal legacy has always been that it is the despoiler of its own ideals. And yet this deep-seated contradiction rarely imperils the confidence with which Americans feel that the “cause of all mankind,” in John F. Kennedy’s words, “is the cause of America.” It is precisely the wanton hyperbole of America’s self-image—it’s hilarious and grotesque, albeit devastatingly effective, distortion of the historical record—that engenders the desire to see it destroyed. And Hollywood has been in overdrive producing depictions that at once expose this contradiction (an America threatened by some black seed whether natural or man-made) so as to disavow it and thus successfully purge its effects (an America heroically redeemed by dispelling its nefarious internal threats). America is incessantly depicted as under threat from some imminent catastrophe (whether from within or without) and it is precisely this threat that occasions its redemption. As a result, the fantasy serves to firmly root in the American psyche the belief that the sundry failures of America to live up to its ideals are merely contingent and hardly threaten its core—a core that can always be resurrected through a heroic response to some catastrophic sequence.

The interest of Abigail D. Deville’s exhibition, Gold Mountain, at Marginal Utility Gallery, in my view, lies in her refusal to cloak her monstrous and comic fantasy of America’s imminent destruction—an America on the verge of being sucked into a black hole—in any kind of redemptive narrative. Her catastrophic vision gringly depicts an America on the brink of implosion, destitute and without the hope of resurrection. She thus forces us to consider the cost of America’s maintenance of its highest ideals.

Her installation depicts America as an ailing giant, likening the Empire in decay to a super red giant imploding through its nuclear consumption: the black hole of American excess. The very ideals of America, for which the flag stands, are perched on the event horizon, their destruction secured, but eternally suspended. The scene is presided over by a single figure—that of a black woman adorned with the heads of pigeons. This lone and singular spectator gazes into the darkness, indifferent to America’s collapse. She is a figure of the oppressed and excluded—a figure whose presence spells certain doom for the ideological fantasy from which she has been excluded and for the fantastical ideal that refuses to acknowledge her presence. The fact that she now appears in an act of self-assertion imperils the system that erected itself on the basis of her exclusion but is also a harbinger of better days. Deville’s Gold Mountain refuses the kind of redemptive narrative that might make the ideal real for everyone and that would thus provide a justification for the ideological fantasy that espouses such ideals. Instead, it reverses the logic of redemption characteristic of the phantasмагoria of Hollywood and of political rhetoric by risking the following thesis: the collapse of the ideal is also the collapse of the logic of exclusion on which it feeds. This pigeon-crowned woman is the one who is left standing in the prosaic halo of a lampshade when the flag and all it symbolizes get sucked into the void.

- Alexis Kukuljevic

It is a strange and uncanny beast of an exhibition—a black lit fantasy that strips the magic from magic mountain, leaving nothing but gold, the source of a dark and caustic radiance.

-Felix Greene

That she now appears in an act of self-assertion imperils the postulation of an encompassing system or enveloping discourse. It is the alignment of signs towards an understanding of true desires. To speak or write is never to abstract, it is to fumble towards a meaning that can only be known in interaction. It is not to build a bridge; it is to realize that the bridge is there but cannot be seen.

LF: Unfortunately, caution has become the critic’s lodestar. So quick to disavow the avant-garde’s taste for negation and its purportedly catastrophic implications, these last men want nothing more than to blink when confronted with the nullity of existence, to revel in their melancholy and to find solace in victimhood—all too willing to prostrate themselves before some traumatic event, to make it into a veritable transcendental before which one must kneel. Our times demand ruthlessness, not caution. We should not so quickly forget the severity of Marx’s critical adage. The ruthless criticism of everything existing seems a quaint ambition in an era buried by reams of critical drivel that fears its own conclusions and avoids at all costs conflict with the powers that be. Yet, for artists and theorists that are still gripped by this anachronistic passion it seems necessary to awaken the demon of negativity.

ED: You sound like a band of ailing nostalgics chanting the rhythmic hymns of yesteryear, which are less likely to awaken the quiescent world from its dogmatic slumber than full us all to sleep with the canonical drumbeat of Marx, Gramsci, Althusser… Marx, Gramsci, Althusser… The critic’s starting point must be a critique of the current sense of critique, including Marxist critique, avant-garde criticism, and so on. In our rejection of the present dystopia, we mustn’t forget the powerful forms of recuperation that have transformed the fundamental structures of the Marxist narrative into a new teleology that is also determined in the last instance by the economic teleology of neo-liberal capitalism to which “there is no alternative”…

LF: You are absolutely right, but the critique of the tradition of critique does not require that we throw the baby out with the bathwater. We can obviously learn from the Marxist